Q&A

Q

What is insider trading?

If I'm talking to family or friends, and I accidentally mention something about our business performance or the like, would that be considered insider trading? For example:

*At dinner, I mentioned an upcoming merger to my family.

*At a meeting with a business partner, I accidentally mentioned that our business had declined significantly before this information was publicly disclosed.

A

Insider trading is a criminal act consisting of the illegal sharing or use of undisclosed information to perform transactions in the securities market, causing harm to investors that do not have access to that data. Those involved in insider trading can be subject to criminal penalties and internal disciplinary action, and can harm the credibility of the company.

A

If someone who receives that information uses it to trade securities, it becomes insider trading. Divulging undisclosed important information creates opportunities for those around you to engage in insider trading. The leakage of information by employees can also result in questions about problems with our information management. Handle any confidential or market sensitive information you receive with utmost care.
